A Catholic priest was awaiting arraignment last night at the Police Administration Building following his arrest earlier yesterday in North Philadelphia's notorious Fairhill drug zone on a possession-of-cocaine charge. The Rev. Nicholas J. Martino, 41, was a passenger inside a 1997 Ford Crown Victoria parked at Hancock and Cambria Streets at 2:08 a.m. when police officers took notice of the vehicle and the two men sitting in it, authorities said. Father Martino had been "released" from his priestly duties two weeks ago because of an ongoing substance-abuse problem, said archdiocesan spokeswoman Cathy Matusiak.

A Philadelphia judge Tuesday reinstated three felony charges against a Catholic priest who is accused of forcing oral sex on a 10-year-old altar boy in 1997. Father Andrew McCormick sat stoically at the defense table as Common Pleas Judge Paula Patrick held him for trial after a brief hearing on involuntary deviate sexual intercourse, sexual assault and statutory sexual assault. Those charges were dismissed by Municipal Judge Karen Y. Simmons following an August preliminary hearing, during which the now-24-year-old alleged victim testified that McCormick, 56, straddled him and put his penis on the victim's lips and on his teeth.
